

James de Finney is a graduate of Laurentian University and the Université de Provence, and has taught in the department of French studies at the Université de Moncton since 1973. His research primarily focuses on Acadian literature, the relationships between the press and literature, and the literary institution. He has been the associate dean of the faculty of graduate studies and the editor of the Revue at the Université de Moncton, and is a member of the board of directors for ACFAS, the Association for Canadian Studies, the Canadian Federation for the Humanities and the journal Francophonies d'Amérique.